ON APPROACHING MOUNT OREAD.

Throned on this throne by earth-stress raised and set —
    A seat enduring of thy termless reign,
    Whence view, o'ersweeping all the peopled plain,
By bounds of distant terraced hills is met
Which way it turns, and ever yet, and yet,
    And sees such beauty as to see is pain,—
    Thou whom to seek, though vainly, is all gain,
Whom to forsake, cross after bloody sweat,

All-blessing Truth, behold us fled to thee,
Thy blind-born children, out of desert land
Where is not any shade of smallest tree,
Nor ooze of water in the cankering sand,
    To be thine ear-pierced servants, for thy breath
    Doth make to see and live: all else is death.

Robert Wilson Neal.

R.E. MARCY, ENG.

Class of '98 to the People of Kansas, Greeting:

By your generosity we are what we are; and with a lively sense of our indebtedness we promise to study the peace and prosperity of the commonwealth.

Class of '98 to the Youth of Kansas, Greeting:

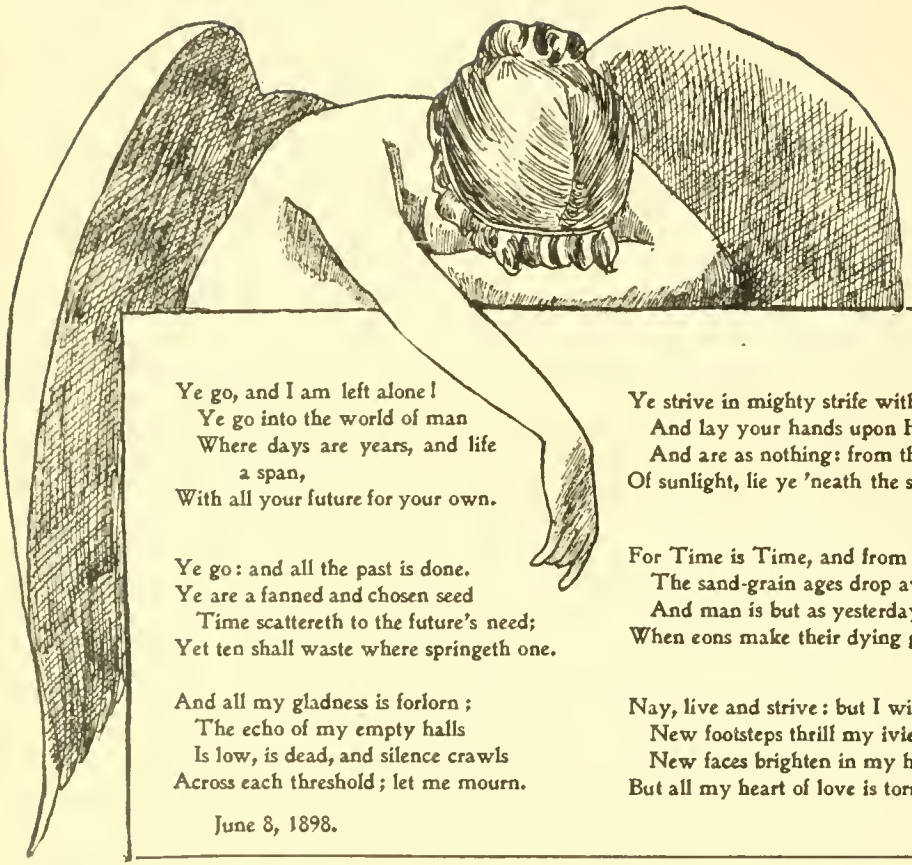
Know ye that the University that Kansas built is an integral part of the public school system of the state, and that just as ye pass from the grades to the high school, so may ye (if ye faint not) pass from the high school to the University.

Have we not spied out the land before you? And do we not bring you a good report? Lo, there will ye find six separate and distinct schools:

SCHOOL OF ARTS,
SCHOOL OF FINE ARTS,
SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING,
SCHOOL OF LAW,
SCHOOL OF PHARMACY,
POST-GRADUATE SCHOOL.

Each school is well equipped, and together they form a goodly university, whose reputation extendeth throughout the land, even unto the coasts thereof, and whose wise men are sought in counsel by the learned men of other nations, even the scientists of Germany.

Go ye up and possess the land; it is yours; only, be ye strong and very courageous.



ALMA MATER:

HER FAREWELL.

Ye go, and I am left alone!
  Ye go into the world of man
  Where days are years, and life
    a span,
With all your future for your own.

Ye go: and all the past is done.
Ye are a fanned and chosen seed
  Time scattereth to the future's need;
Yet ten shall waste where springeth one.

And all my gladness is forlorn;
  The echo of my empty halls
  Is low, is dead, and silence crawls
Across each threshold; let me mourn.

June 8, 1898.

Ye strive in mighty strife with God
  And lay your hands upon His work,
  And are as nothing: from the murk
Of sunlight, lie ye 'neath the sod.

For Time is Time, and from his grasp
  The sand-grain ages drop away,
  And man is but as yesterday
When eons make their dying gasp.

Nay, live and strive: but I will mourn.
  New footsteps thrill my ivied walls,
  New faces brighten in my halls,
But all my heart of love is torn.

And these shall go as ye have gone,
  To live and strive and pass away,
  To roll vain stones up hill for day,
And perish ere they see the dawn.

Yet, live and strive. My mother love
  Approves you nobler for the strife
  And holds you dearer for the life
Ye lost and found when that ye strove.

But I must mourn, but I must mourn.
  Dead past doth the dead past o'erclose,
  Yet thought pursues where love foregoes;
And all my heart of love is torn.

Robert Wilson Neal.

Bricks Without Straw.

Last Summer, while excavating in the Bad Lands, our University Geologists found a crumbling parallelopiped of some unknown substance having on one side a pictorial representation. The meaning of this curious relic of the past was completely shrouded in mystery until very recently, when a bright Senior discovered that it was merely another instance of coming events casting their shadows before. In this shadow, it is asserted, is portrayed a scene from "Bricks Without Straw," the great Senior Play of the Class of '98.

On the second page following is given a fac-simile of the pictured side of this parallelopiped. For further information scientists and philosophers are referred to the Prefatory Remarks.

"Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
And never brought to mind?"

The closing scenes of our school-days have come. Another page of our life history has been turned back, leaving but pure, white blanks, not for what we choose, but for what we must write upon them. We part, in entering upon this new life, one from the other, some to achieve greatness, some to be merely content, some—but why speak of them?

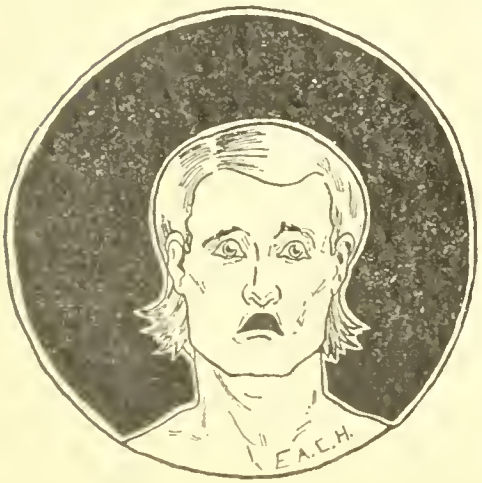
In the days that are to come, in the days of the "old songs," the ghosts of dead memories will perchance rise before our mind's eye—a sweet and silent company of classmates and friends and teachers.

It is for just such moments as these that this little book has been prepared—for the sake of Auld Lang Syne.

It is now bidden on this errand forth. May it fulfill its simple mission is the wish of the Class of Ninety-eight.

The Class of '98.

Strange but true is the fact that every class graduated from every college in the land is in the habit of telling untruths. By which we mean that every graduating class lauds itself to the skies as the handsomest, smartest, and best body of men and maidens that ever made their exodus from their respective college, if not from any college in the world.



The Class of Ninety-eight of the University of Kansas has taken a unique position in this matter. It does not claim to be the handsomest class that has ever left the University—far from it—nor the smartest, nor yet the largest, brightest, most lovable and most beloved—no, none of these. But with that candor that has characterized all its actions, with the love of truth paramount, it does claim to be the dullest, slowest, most verdant, and altogether the most hopeless class, as a class, that has ever been graduated from the University of Kansas, or, indeed, from any university or college—Baker, of course, excepted. The Class of Ninety-eight is unique, we say, in this particular. More than this, it is decidedly original, for it has been demonstrated from statistics gathered by the Sociology classes, that study Bad Boys and Other Such Things, that no other class known to college history has ever claimed to possess the aforesaid characteristics.

As Freshmen.

Perhaps some evidences of the truth of the statement concerning originality can be gathered from the "dim and distant vista of the past."

It is asserted that on the 7th day of September, 1894, a band of rosy-cheeked lads and lassies, with slates and penny sponges, or, lacking this latter, a much-berubbed and shiny coat-sleeve, toiled wearisomely up Mount Oread and entered into the dark, & echoing & labyrinthian caverns of Fraser Hall.

Dryden foresaw just such an event when he wrote:

"The fool of nature stood with stupid eyes
And gaping mouth, that testified surprise."

It is needless to add, then, that eyes blue, black, brown, and gray were wide, wide open from astonishment. It is needless to say that the huddling band wandered aimlessly around in search of something that they could not find; needless to say that staid and dignified professors grew fairly purple in the face from suppressed laughter at the sound of tiny voices quaveringly inquiring, "Say, teacher, where is the chapel? Ain't you goin'?"

They have learned better since then—we mean the Class of Ninety-eight, not the professors.

In the course of time and after much effort had been put forth on the part of their keepers, the Freshman lambs were at last gathered into their proper corral. Then it was that the inevitable black sheep brought mischief into the fold. Then it was that the old, old game for lambs—and men as well—was introduced to this innocent flock, which has continued ever since to "Follow the Leader."

And then it was that, doing away with their sheepish looks, the Freshmen organized as a class, choosing officers and—legend has it—a yell, and colors. Nothing more remained to be done. They sank back into oblivion, from which they aroused themselves only upon the First of May. In short, it was not until the middle of the Sophomore year that the Class of Ninety-eight began to realize that it was unique, original—but, in the language of the fipenny wrapper, "this is anticipating."

AS SOPHOMORES.

Contrary to the hopes and expectations of the Faculty, the Class of Ninety-eight returned at the beginning of the school year in 1895. No signs were visible in the early part of the term of the vast stores of energy and enthusiasm which were later to be poured out upon a suffering public. No one seeing this sober and sedate band of Sophomores, surging as one man toward the English History lecture-room, could ever have dreamed that they were in future days to "fruit" the Juniors and add thorns to the crown of the Disciplinary Committee.

But, as the novelists say, and, indeed, we believe that the statement is generally accepted as a fact, time passed on. The mid-year examinations came and went, leaving the Sophomore ranks practically intact. Then, believing its intellectual abilities and its influence over the Faculty to be fairly well established, the Sophomore class turned its attention to other matters.

The first thing which came to its notice was the Junior Promenade. At first thought the connection between the Sophomores and the Junior Promenade is not very apparent; however, it was the leading characteristic of the class at that time to show no interest whatever in its own affairs, but to be deeply agitated over matters which seemed not to concern it at all. Well, the Sophomores interested themselves in the welfare of the Juniors to such an extent that a valiant band of eleven was requested to explain this unusual interest to the Disciplinary Committee. The oratorical efforts put forth on that occasion are said to have been truly touching.

"Some example must be made to put a stop to these wild-cat, newspaper reports about class riots," was the verdict of the committee.

"Let's drop the affair right here," pleaded the Sophomore class president. "If you ex— ahem— excuse us boys, it will make the newspaper reports worse than ever. Better drop it."

Then the Chancellor arose solemnly, and all present knew by his manner that he had a clinching argument to present.

"Year before last," he said, "you fruited the boys and took their cravats; last year you fruited them and took cravats and hats; this year you fruited them and took cravats, hats, suspenders, cuffs, and collars. Now I ask, where will this end?"

The horrible prospect so worked upon the feelings of the committee that the boys were excused from class duty for fifteen or thirty days.

There came the First of May again. The Freshman feared to raise a pole, "because the faculty were opposed to such disturbance"; but the Sophomore didn't, and up that pole went. He took it down himself, principally because he wanted to, and secondarily because he was requested to do so.

This was only the beginning of a period of abnormal and phenomenal activity, for the historic Sophomore Spread and the class ball-games followed in quick succession. In fact, the spring of Ninety-six was a banner spring, and many went home suffering from that tired feeling peculiar to the spring season.

AS JUNIORS.

After using a considerable quantity of Involuntary Summer Tonic for that tired feeling, the Class of Ninety-eight returned in the fall as blissful Juniors, elated over the fact that "deference is now due to me."

In fact, the energy of the class was so great at this time, that in the language of one of its members, "a rattling good class meeting was held, and everything went ship-shape." Perhaps it did, we hope so; but, at any rate, this nautical figure adhered to it, and the class suffered the fate of a white-winged vessel in a summer calm. Nothing was heard of it for some time. The reaction had set in.

Nevertheless, in the course of human events a very grave and momentous question arose. To be or not to be, that was the question, and it was decided that the Junior Promenade should be. Three several times it was decided that it should be, three several times it was decided that it should not be. Finally, believing that the spirit of harmony should prevail over all its actions, the class decided that it would again give another evidence of its originality by not having a Junior Promenade after all.

It was not until the latter part of the year that the Juniors again came to the front. For certain economical reasons it was thought best to entertain the Seniors, and seeing that a general interest could not be aroused in the matter, the young women of the class determined to take the matter into their own hands. They did, and a large and successful meeting was called in which the feminine element only was represented. But this was not to last long, for in the course of a few moments a timid knock was heard upon the door. Quoth the women, "Never, never!" But they were so aghast at the sight which was revealed to them that the thirty or more young men were allowed to enter the assembly-room in comparative safety.

Then it was that the Juniors aroused themselves and worked in harmony and with energy. A snap and a dash began to characterize their movements.

They entertained the Seniors royally in Library Hall with the historic Junior Ghost Party, and of course they got their tickets to the Senior Play in return.

Some feared that the reaction would again come, and that as Seniors the class would sink back into its normal lethargic state. But it was not to be; the reformation had taken place.

AS SENIORS.

A class of ordinary grit and perseverance, meeting the obstacles, failures, and disappointments which were suffered by the Class of Ninety-eight during its Junior year, would undoubtedly have given up the struggle in despair. Not so wtth the Seniors. Obstacles are their encouragements, failures and disappointments their incentives to success.

The year opened with a display of energy in the election of class officers which was phenomenal. The details of this election would no doubt be of interest to the public; but the events connected with it were so intensely exciting, and partisan feeling ran so high, that it is deemed more polite not to publish the official records at present.

Soon after the election, arrangements were made for the production of a Senior Play and a class Annual. The class also decided to adopt caps and gowns during Commencement week, and to arrange for a class party.

That was the party that never was. The Class of Ninety-eight, be it known, ever since its Freshman year, has shown a disposition toward economy, commendable no doubt, but detrimental to the success of parties. Also, either from natural timidity or through dissatisfaction with the assortment of girls afforded by the class, the Ninety-eight boys have always shown an unconquerable aversion to furnishing the Ninety-eight girls escorts on such occasions. These two things combined have kept the Senior class party in the realms of the imagination. That one memorable social function, which, according to the invitations was to take place upon the sixteenth of December, and then suddenly didn't, will always remain as a monument to the—well, originality of the Class of Ninety-eight.

Soon after the excitement about the party had died out, the class held a meeting, and decided not to have caps and gowns during Commencement week.

The class held another meeting, and decided firmly to wear caps and gowns during Commencement week.

Still another meeting was called, and the class decided just as firmly not to wear caps and gowns during Commencement week.

It had been thought that, of all the enterprises undertaken by the Class of Ninety-eight, the Senior Play alone was progressing smoothly and without opposition. A successful reading rehearsal had been held, but suddenly a horrible discovery was made: the play was found to be full of loathsome personalities, which were to be forced upon an innocent and unsuspecting class by a designing committee. At the class meeting in which this awful discovery was brought to light, at least half a dozen addresses were made, any one of which was sufficient to disprove the statement that oratory is dying out in the University of Kansas.

The cap and gown question was again discussed at this meeting, and absolutely the latest news upon this subject is that caps and gowns will be worn by the Seniors during Commencement week.

The Class of Ninety-eight is now of the past. It has had the same varied experience that other classes have had. It has had the same joys and sorrows. It has been no better; it has been no worse. Looking backward upon its trials and its successes, we lovingly whisper the dear old "Rock Chalk" in lingering accents, and tearfully write "Finis."
